Pass It On!

by Curt B. Witcher

In my more than three decades of work with family historians in the Genealogy Center here in Fort Wayne, it has been amazing and gratifying to see all the wonderful ways genealogists have shared their knowledge, their experiences and their work with others. More so now than ever, it is vitally important that we take active steps to ensure that our family histories, and the records we use to document them, are available for our children's children to discover and enjoy. That is why I am excited about the American Library Association's "Preservation Week," May 9th to the 15th.

This first-ever initiative, entitled "Pass It On: Saving Heritage and Memories," encourages communities across the country to celebrate and educate around the themes of collecting and preserving local and family history. Libraries are encouraged to get involved by creating displays and offering programs. And we are doing just that in the Genealogy Center. Each day of preservation week, we will offer a program addressing some aspect of "passing it on." Monday's program, "Photo Restoration Using Adobe Photoshop," is a crowd-favorite and features Kay Spears demonstrating effective ways to utilize Adobe Photoshop, so that you are passing on the best and truest digital images. The library's preservationist, Becky Schipper, will discuss practical preservation tips and tools that everyone will find useful in her Tuesday presentation. Wednesday evening, Dawne Slater-Putt will present a program on organizing your genealogical information--hard copies, computer files, photographs and so much more. I think we all could use a little help with organization. Thursday afternoon, I am presenting a two-hour session that will focus, first, on simple, practical ways of preserving family documents and heirlooms and, second, on simple ways to begin writing your family story. Writing down what we know about our family stories, recording how our research has enlightened us, and sharing our memories of important life events are all part of passing it on. Friday, Kay Spears will share her expertise again, this time offering important tips and techniques for scanning documents. Preservation week will conclude with a program on how to effectively search Ancestry.com. It is important to improve our use of online sources, so we can construct better genealogies to pass on to our children and their children.

There are other ways to "pass it on" as well. The FamilySearch research wiki is a new and phenomenal way to share your expertise with the larger genealogical community. If you know the unique repositories, records, and strategies for successfully researching in your locale, why not share that with others? If you do share, more people will be able to do better research and compile more worthwhile histories. And isn’t that what we want? Then those histories can be passed on.

WeRelate.org is an excellent site for posting family and local history data, so that a number of individuals can work together online. It’s also a great site for posting what I call orphan data--data that you don’t believe fits into your family history, but that is too valuable just to discard. Examples of such data might be photographs of non-relatives, certificates, daybooks, and even GEDCOM files. Instead of burying these orphan documents in a file cabinet, why not post them where others can benefit from them? Another researcher may be able to provide additional context for your orphan data.

Another way of passing it on is to provide a copy of your work to the Genealogy Center of the Allen County Public Library. For years, we have offered a photocopy exchange program. If you grant us permission to copy your compilation for our research collection, we will make a complimentary bound copy for you and return your original no worse for wear. We also accept electronic copies, and we welcome the opportunity to scan "all things military," from service and pension records to posters, images of medals, and discharge papers, as well as letters and diaries.

It is so important to take the time and make the effort to "pass it on." Of what ultimate use is our research if others cannot benefit from it? One of the saddest things to discover is a lifetime of genealogical research being thrown away by disinterested family members because they just didn’t know what it was--because it wasn’t passed on. Step up this month and pass it on!

Southern Presbyterian Newspapers
by Melissa Shimkus

When searching for vital records in the southern United States, researchers quickly discover that some records have been destroyed. They also may find that their ancestors lived in an area that did not require birth, marriage and death records until the 20th century. Knowing the religious denomination of an ancestor can suggest supplemental records, such as baptism, marriage, and burial registers or religious newspapers. Researchers looking for Presbyterians in the South should consult Brent H. Holcomb’s four volumes of abstracts of marriage and death notices in southern Presbyterian newspapers. Each volume is organized by date and has a name index.

The abstracts found in "Marriage and Death Notices from the 'Charleston Observer' 1827-1845" (975.7 H73MD) are not only a substitute source of vital records data, but also of additional details about an ancestor's life. For example, Revolutionary War soldier Col. James M. C. Montgomery, who later served from 1791 to 1792 during Indian disturbances at Dean's Station, Tennessee, had been a school-mate of General Andrew Jackson. The notices from this volume also can be accessed at Ancestry.com.

An ancestor's obituary may reveal the family's migration route, as does that for James M. Morrison, who joined the Presbyterian Church in Rocky River, North Carolina, in 1809, moved to Valley Creek, Alabama, in 1816, and settled in Yalobusha County, Mississippi, in 1835, where he died in 1848. These details appear in Holcomb's volume titled "Death and Marriage Notices from 'The Watchman and Observer' 1845-1855" (975 H69DE). Though "The Watchman and Observer" was published in the South, it included marriage and death notices of church members who had moved north, such as those for the Rev. Garner A. Hunt, who died in New Jersey at age 84, and Mrs. Mary Gildersleeve, who died in Canandaigua, New York.

Excerpts from "Marriage and Death Notices from 'The Southern Presbyterian,' Vol. 1: 1847-1865" (975 H69MB) illustrate how these vital event items can define relationships and provide other clues for additional research. For example, the marriage notice for Fannie Maxwell and R. Wilson who wed in Belair, Florida, in 1859, noted that Fannie was the eldest daughter of John Maxwell. Alabama resident Robert Sprait's 1862 obituary mentioned that he was born in County Down, Ireland, and immigrated to America 22 years earlier. A second volume of notices from "The Southern Presbyterian" extends coverage to 1879.

In the absence of a vital record, determine an ancestor's religious affiliation and look for a substitute in ecclesiastical sources. Holcomb's volumes of abstracts of southern Presbyterian newspaper notices are examples of this type of valuable source.

Voter Records, Valuable Resources
by Delia Cothrun Bourne

Voter lists often are cited as possible sources for research, but many disregard their value believing that, at best, they are only indications of a person's presence in a specific place, at a specific time. But voter record collections can supply much more information than that.

The Genealogy Center holds "The Foreign-Born Voters of California in 1872," a microfiche edition of a publication compiled by Jim Faulkinbury in 1994. Entries in this list are arranged alphabetically and include voter's full name, age, birth country, date and place of naturalization, court in which naturalization took place, year registered to vote and county. For example, Carl Schneider of San Francisco, age 49, was born in Prussia, was naturalized in the Cincinnati, Ohio Superior Court on 7 October 1844, and registered to vote in 1867. Martin Schnabel of Placer County, age 24, was born in Germany but received his citizenship by the naturalization of his father. Henry Martyn Scudder, age 44, was born in Ceylon to American parents, so was a citizen even though born in a foreign country. He registered to vote in San Francisco in 1866. And Juan Maron, age 61, was born in Baja California, Mexico, but became a citizen by treaty when California became an American possession. Also included are demographic tables showing, for each county, the percentage and number of voters by country of birth. This is an invaluable source for those researching ancestors who lived in the Golden State both before and during early statehood.

Another example of the bounty of information that can be found in voter records is the “Deceased Voter Registrations 1934-1975” for Allen County, Indiana. These records, held in the Genealogy Center on ten reels of microfilm, are arranged alphabetically and provide name, original address and subsequent addresses of the voter, ward and precinct, and the voter’s signature. For example, Hugh M. Stephenson’s record indicates that he was born in Selina (Celina), Ohio, was 41 years old when he registered to vote on 22 January 1934, and died 4 December 1969. His residence was listed as 1002 Northwood Boulevard throughout that period. Dewey Gillespie was born in Rhea County, Tennessee, 31 August 1896 and lived at 1121 Thayer Street when he registered on 29 September 1942. During the next few years, he lived on McCulloch and Eliza streets. He died 19 April 1974. And the registration card for Rex Potterf, director of the public library, lists his multiple residences and captures for future generations his flamboyant, sweeping signature.

Voter records provide a wealth of information and offer multiple clues for genealogical research. Be sure to take advantage of these valuable resources.

Technology Tip of the Month--Further Adventures with Adobe Photoshop: Three Tools You Should Know!
by Kay Spears

In the next short series of articles, I will explore three tools in Adobe Photoshop. These tools are a little more advanced, but you will find them to be very useful.

The first tool, Levels, can be used to correct both black & white and color photographs. It is located in two places, on the Menu bar and in the Layers palette. I will be working with the one “nested” in the Layers palette.

Secondly, I’ll discuss how to correct black and white photographs using the Channels tool located on the Layers palette.

And finally, I will tell you how to restore those oversized, rolled-up military or family reunion photographs. I’ll review how to flatten them, scan them and then merge the scanned pieces together into a panoramic view by using the Photomerge tool.

Preservation Tip of the Month--Separating Old Photographs That Are Stuck Together
by Becky Schipper

I was asked recently how to separate photographs that had become stuck together over time. I also have had questions about removing the old, paper album pages from the backs of photos. I have searched far and wide to find answers to these questions. I have not been successful.
I have gathered information from many reliable sources including: the Image-Permanence Institute, Heritage Preservation, RetouchPRO, FEMA, the Conservation Center for Art and Historic Artifacts, Solinet, Gaylord Brothers, Etherington Conservation Services, and the Library of Congress. All of these agencies recommend contacting a photographic conservator for this procedure.

There are several websites that give advice on separating photographs, but they differ widely on the steps and materials to use. I did not find any that I would recommend. The suggestions range from soaking in warm water to soaking in cool water. Other suggestions include putting the items in the freezer for 20 minutes, microwaving them for five seconds, using a scrap booking product called Un-du and holding them above a pot of steaming water. None of these procedures are tested or recommended by preservation professionals.

Photographic conservators may be located through the following two organizations: Guild of Bookworkers (www.guildofbookworkers.org) and the American Institute of Conservation (www.conservation-us.org).

StoryCorps Is Coming in July!
We are pleased to announce that StoryCorps is coming to Northeast Indiana! Since 2003, more than 50,000 people have had their stories recorded by StoryCorps and preserved at the American Folklife Center at the Library of Congress, and millions have heard some of these stories over National Public Radio stations. With the stated mission of providing Americans of all backgrounds and beliefs the opportunity to record, share and preserve their stories, StoryCorps uses everyday people to record 40-minute interviews with their friends, family and neighbors. Sponsored by Northeast Indiana Public Radio, the StoryCorps MobileBooth will be in the area in July.

To help you take advantage of this opportunity, the Genealogy Center will offer a number of events on preserving personal, family and community history. Lectures on scrapbooking, photograph restoration, and organizing and preserving of family treasures are being planned to supplement NIPR's activities during StoryCorps' visit. Watch our website at http://www.acpl.lib.in.us/genealogy/programs.html for more information.
